FONT GUIDE

SERIF

Serifs are semi-structural details on the ends of some of the strokes that make up letters and symbols. Any font with these details is considered a 'serif typeface'. Serif fonts are widely used in traditional printed material such as books and newspapers.

A sans serif font is one that does not have the small features called 'serifs' at the ends of strokes. The term comes from the French word sans, meaning without. Sans serif fonts have become the de facto standard for body text on-screen, especially online.

Handwritten

Handwritten and script fonts are based on the fluid strokes of natural handwriting; they're a great way to add a personal touch to a design or layout and work well in contrast to serif and sans serif fonts.

Decorative

Decorative fonts can be used to add a certain 'look' or 'feel' to a design project or layout. These fonts should be used in moderation and only for headers or subheads. Using a decorative font as body copy will make text difficult to read and may make a layout look cluttered or messy.
